 NOVEMBER 14

Haining, Zhejiang Province

The next wave of China's economic development

Why Attend This Event

Organized by AABDC, this information session and networking luncheon will be attended by the Executive Vice Mayor of Haining and other high level foreign trade officials from the municipality who will share details on export trade, investment and SME business development opportunities between New York State and the region. The leaders of Haining are eager to meet with NYC based businesses, political leaders and entrepreneurs who are interested in pursuing business with China. The city has a strong economic base with promising prospects in a number of industry sectors including manufacturing, bio-medical, automotive, pharmaceutical, technology/software and food/beverage.

About Haining

Haining City in Zhejiang Province, which is located on China's east coast, is 75 miles from Shanghai and 35 miles from Hangzhou, two already well-developed cities, with their own airports and express highways, making Haining very accessible. The region was planned to serve as a gateway to Shanghai and a second tier city in the fast growing economic development of the Yangtze River Delta region. The Central government is aggressively developing the country's transportation infrastructure to support its phased opening up of the inland regions of the country, which means smaller cities are now accessible and as a result they are developing economic zones to attract investment from both foreign and domestic companies. These second tier cities, each of which is looking to attract specific industries, are the next wave of China's economic development.
